The old schoolhouse is standing just as Wordsworth left it. It is noted in literature as the "Grammar School of Hawkshead," and its "Rules," in the handwriting of Archbishop Sandy, of York, who founded the school in 1585, may till be seen. It is no more than a tiny stone dangeon, with wide, low windows, a single broad, low door, and a white-maked echoolroom interior, where a tall man would be in danger of bumping the ceiling beams with his head. The schoolboy, Wordsworth, cat his name into his deak, and the scarred old plank is accordingly prized as a precious relic. s accordingly prized as a precious relic. Every one will remember the good old dame, Anne Tyson, with whom Wordsworth lived, and who was so much a mother to him during his boyhood's days at Hawkshead. Her cottage is still standing; and "The snow white church upon the hill," made famous in the "Prelude." stands is then in a near field. Around it the heep and lambs are grazing. But the he handlooms; you will never find a saif score of worshipers at service within it; and the incumbency is so re-deserted shrine.

For some unaccountable reason, but little of Wordsworth's poetical devotion was given to his birth spot, Cockermouth, or to his youthide haunts at Hawshead. Scenically, their surroundings would seem to prompt the same, equally with the more central lake region, upon which his highest genius was expended. While all the lake region is, properly speaking, Wordsworth's land, the interest and feeling of the thoughtful traveler seem to parcel he thoughtful traveler seem to parce the district into two almost equally fas-cinating topographical and literary divi-sions—the northern and the southern; though both of these are central. These are very near each other in miles, and tenderly near in associative interest. The northern district is topographically dominated by Skiddaw, Saddleback and Grassmoor. It possesses the beautiful lakes of Bassenthwaite, Derwent, Ullswater and Thirlmere. It has Keswick town for a central point from which to seek its scenic splendors; while as a distinct area it seems sacred to the memories of Colerridge, Shelly and Southey. The southern, and, all things, considered, perhaps the sunnier and more exquisite of the two, is overshadowed by the mountered. hough both of these are central. These haps the sunnier and more exquisite of the two, is overshadowed by the moun-tain monarch of the whole lake region, Helvellyn, by High Street, by Sea Fell and Bow Fell, and by Coniston Old Man (from the old British ald maen-hill of stone). The entrancing lakes of Coniston, Windermere, Rydal and Gras-mere silver its noble dales and vales; in the hardest of Romess. Ambieside. hamlets of Bowness, Ambleside is more sliver its noble dales and valer; in the hamlets of Bowness, Ambleside, Rydal and Grasmere cluster its sweet old Cumbrian homes, and their neighborhood is chiefly rife with memorise of Martineau, Hemans, Arnold, "Christopher North," DeQuincy and Wordsworth.

The latter first intended to build his home at Applethwaite, on How Gill, a lovely spot on the southern slope of Skiddaw, within sight of Southey's Greta Hall and Keswick, and within hearing of the chimes of old Crossthwaite church. The land was a gift to him from Sir George Beaumont, of Colerton, and still remains the property of his descendants. But on his permanent return to the lake region he made the ancient village of Grasmere his home. This hamlet is on the main coach road, trayersing from north to south the central and most beautiful portions of the lake district, and is but three miles from Rydal and five from Ambleside, which lie to the south. Here he resided for three years—first at Dove Cottage, afterward occupied by DeQuincy, and now forming a portion of the outbuildings of a busy inn; next in a roomier but less comfortable house at Allen Bank, and again in the partonage of the ancient Grasmere church. In 1813 the Wordsworths moved to Rydal Mount, where the poet remained until his death in 1850, having uninterruptedly lived within a three miles radius of where he now lies in Chickester's English Diamond Brand.

If you were wandering north on the main coach road from Windermere to Keswick, a steep, wide road way turning to the right and east would attract your attention. From the inclosures on either side huge beech trees and sycamores push tremendous trees across the walls and completely cover the way. It is as shadowy as twilight here. You will not have passed a score of rods up this high arched nature's sisle until the sounds from the highway—the rumbling of the stages, the laughter of gay tourists, and even the notes of the coach horns—are stilled. In the summer the place is thronged with birds. Even these irreverent choristers seem as if subdued and ruminative here. In autumn your leet sink in feathery masses of pale stilled. In the summer the place is thronged with birds. Even these interested and ruminative here. In autumn your feet sink in feathery masses of pale golden leaves. It seems a long time is that you have been traversing these few frods; all is so husbed and still. Ascending a little farther, there is a break in the foliage to your right. Some huge gates are seen. A lodge stands just beyond, and suddenly the splendid facades of Rydal Hail, the seat of the Le Flemings, appear above the luxuriant shrubbery of its splendid park. Higher still you climb, and where the dark roadway seems to make a final circle over the brow of the hill to the left, you pause to listen. Something like low and hesitant organ notes is murmuring in minor chords, while a gay and joyous treble plays in exultant tones above. Ah! you remember. These are the voices of the two cascades of Rydal. Their songs were sung to one post for forty happy tify and beceme acquainted with Words worth's best loved haunts. Two lines Hawkshead, where the lad Wordsworth passed his first years of school life is in the most northern part of Lancaster, where that shire pushes up into the southern reach of the lake region. It lies midway between the queen of the English lakes, Windermere, and Coniston Water, near which may be found the home of John Ruskin, and nesties pretity beside the beautiful E-thwaite Water. It is by far the most antique village of the lake country—

"All angles, twists and crooks, With penthouses and sables over archways, wents and nooks," with penthouses and gables over archways, wents and nooks," as Gibson oddily sang; while its year teee, under which many of Wordsworth's earlier verses were written, are quite as majestic and far more beautiful than the famous yews of Borrowdale. The old schoolhouse is standing just as Wordsworth left it. It is no more than a tiny stone daugeon, with wide, low windows, a single broad, low door, and a white washed schoolroom interior, where a tall man would be in danger of bumping the ceiling heans with bis head. The of road, with innumerable pony and vellyn, was a never-ending feast to him. He lingered times without number around Wythburn church. Thirlmere, to which the city of Manchester has tunto which the city of Manchester has tunnelled for what will prove the finest water supply in the world, and against the consummation of which Mr. Ruskin, with more regard for selfish enjoyment of the lake region than the needs of hosts of human beings, fought long and bitterly, was an almost constant haunt.

Here Wordsworth, in company with his wife and his sister Dorothy, almost daily came in summer. In the earlier days Coleridge would come over from Keswick and meet the three friends from Grasmere. The ladies brought their sewing and lunch, and the two poets furnished the soil and ambrosia. Commemorative of these golden hours the poets had their names cut upon the Rock of Names at Thrimmere, and it was to this rock that Wordsworth addressed rithin it; and the incumency is memorated to the same and the poets had their names cut upon the ings the chime of belis which calls the Rock of Names at Thirlmere, and it was it in old folk that remain to this all but to this rock that Wordsworth addressed

he apostrophe,

"O thought of pain, That would impair it or protane!"

That would impair it or prolane!"

No fear of that; but the great walls Manchester is building at the lower end of Thirlmere, to increase its depth, will cause the Rock of Names to be permanently submerged. Some future Schliemann will find it.

On the way from Grasmere to Thirlmere a spot forming the northwestern boundary of Grasmere was undoubtedly Wordsworth'a most frequented and passionately loved resort. This is Easdale. It is one of the most accessible though least visited places in the lake region. It runs far into the northern hills on the western side of Helm Crag. In its upper reach is a bittern haunted. region. It runs far into the northern hills on the western side of Helm Crag. In its upper reach is a bittern haunted, shadowy tarn, which is discharged through the foaming Sour Milk Ghyll not a mise from the highway of Grasmere. Wordsworth loved to claim Easdale as all his own, and he was jealous of intrusion here. When residing at Grasmere, a half hour's walk would enable him to penetrate its depths; and he so grew to the place that when he had removed to Rydal, three miles to the south, nearly every day, rain or shine, found him seeking the companionship of its tender solitudes. The loftiest passages of the "Excursion" were written here; and it was the very essence of the poet's life, to brood by Easdale tarn, with an intensity of passion, on those images of nature which his noble fancy brought from near and afar, and molded into fadeless forms for the measureless world of poetic thought. the measureless world of poetic thought. The man who tried Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy, and was aure of the $500 reward offered by the proprietors for an incurable case, never called for his money. Why not? O, because he got cured! He was sure of two things: (1) That his catarrh could not be cured. (2) That he would have that $500. He is now sure of one thing, and that is, that his catarrh is gone completely. So he is out $500, of course. CHICAGO, May 8.—The day was lively in the wheat pit to day. The price plunged up and down rapidly. The market opened in a weak, a mine to panicky condition, and was nevrous and flighty with a weak understone all day. It was reported that the great grain firm of Ephrazii & Co., of Paris, had falled and this was taken as an indication of coming froutbe among the wheat buils elsewhere. Berlin and Antwerp prices were lower, though the closing Paris and Londatter of the coming froutbe among the wheat buils elsewhere. Berlin and Antwerp prices were lower, though the closing Paris and Londatter leef, together with a London cable, asyling that the Paris tailure was not the great grain merchant, but a small house of a similar name, which caused a raily. The failure of a small bank in Prilladeiphia also counted against the market.

Corn was setive, fluctuating frequently within the established range, the seculiment pravailing being carly about equally dirided.
